

“This experience is an opportunity to identify our weaknesses as leaders for social change. Emancipating ourselves from the oppressive system is a process in which communities of learning are involved while emancipating from it and we will finally defeat it.”

We all volunteer at HIJOS Guatemala and everyone does a little bit of everything because we have a horizontal structure. As a result of our work we have been able to bring out the topic of genocide and the less humanitarian crimes as a matter of social class which opened the gate to the economic global system. To remember those who have died for social revolution means to keep on the struggle against globalization and to work for alternative ways of development, organization and expression.

We focus on the field of historical memory, justice and social movements. We try to encourage new generations of young people to get to know about the genocide and the less humanitarian crimes committed by Guatemala's State during the war. Individual and collective memory are a very useful tool to organize youth and to develop the struggle for social justice and resistance today.
