International Women's Day (IWD) has been celebrated around the world for over a century as a way for women to claim their political, economic and social rights, as well as to protest against injustices that affect women and their families.

In the early 20th century, IWD was started by socialist women in order to fight for fair wages and safer working conditions in the garment factories where many North American women worked. In Europe, during the First World War, IWD events became an annual way for women across national borders to show their collective opposition to a brutal and bloody war. In 1975 the United Nations declared International Women's Year and marked March 8th as the official day for International Women's Day marches and celebrations.

Around the world, women and their families use IWD as a platform to celebrate the achievements of women in fighting for their human rights, but also to continue to push for the changes still needed locally and around the world.

Without community, there is no liberation.
